If this is the case, or if we have reached the end of the batch of records, the program examines the row of colored squares the program belonging to the last target just read, and changes the colors of the client row and the server row above it accordingly. This is how ~~itdecides~~ it decides what squares to change to what color for a given day.

Please amend the paragraph starting at page 13, line 4 of the specification as follows:

If the backup server name has changed from ~~theprevious~~ the previous record, then a new row (example of a server row: F2.N in figure 2) is added for that new server, and a new client row (example of a client row: F2.P in figure 2) is added for that new client. For each such row added, all the squares to the right are set to red.
